“Some odd-looking characters, dressed in striped shirts and block trousers leapt into the wagon. They held electric torches and truncheons. They began to strike out to right and left, shouting: “Everybody get out!” (Chapter 2, page 26)	“When the next train arrived, we opened the boxcar doors and walked onto the train with our weapons. The stench was horrible, so we worked quickly. The only thing we knew to do was to get all of the Jews out of the train as fast as we could.”	“Watching the German Soldiers get the passengers out of the train was one of the worst things that I have ever done. They soldiers treated the passengers like they were nothing, especially not humans. I will never forget the sound of them yelling.”
